● 英語訳 English translation

My company president values employee opinions. Last month, the president conducted a survey of employees. The survey asked about the work environment and working styles. All male and female employees participated. The survey was conducted online, making it easy for anyone to complete.

An employee in charge compiled the survey results into a report. The report clearly outlined both the positive aspects and the problems. For example, many employees commented that it was easy to take time off. However, there were also a significant number of comments about excessive overtime.

Last Friday, there was a meeting to present the survey results. The president and all employees attended. The person in charge used graphs and tables to explain the findings clearly. After reviewing the report, the president said, "I want to make the company even better." He also added, "Thanks to everyone's feedback, I now understand the problems much better. Please continue to share any further observations or opinions you may have." In this way, I learned that surveys are important for improving the company.
